"While speaking the other day to the people, I observed that 'the race was not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong,' neither riches to men of wisdom. I happened to cast my eyes upon IRA AMES, who was sitting in the congregation. I knew he had been in the Church a considerable length of time,

I have been personally acquainted with him for twenty years. My eye also caught many more of the first Saints at the same time. These men know that 'Mormonism' is true, they have moved steadily forward, and have not sought to become noted characters as many have; but, unseen as it were, they have maintained their footing steadily in the right path. I could place my hand upon many in this congregation, who will win the race, though they are not very swift, to outward appearance, and they make no great pretensions; they are found continually attending to their own business. They do not appear to be great warriors, or as if they were likely to win the battle. But what is their true character? They have faith today, they are filled with faith, their words are few, but they are full of integrity. You will find them tomorrow as they were yesterday, or are today. Visit them when you will, or under what circumstances, and you find them unalterably the same; and finally when you have spent your life with them, you will find that their lives throughout have been well spent, full of faith, hope, charity, and good works, as far as they have had the ability. These are the ones who will win the race, conquer in the battle, and obtain the peace and righteousness of eternity. 1:89.
